Even diva-pop moves on – something Celine Dion has acknowledged on her first English-language album in six years. While she hasn't completely abandoned the "more is more" vocalising that evokes locomotives and power stations, she has toned it down, exposing the nerve endings beneath the bombast. And she has veered away from Diane Warrenesque power balladry (though Warren does get a credit on the uncharacteristically lithe Unfinished Songs), toward tracks by Ne-Yo, Sia and Daniel Merriweather. The finished product is almost a reinvention. The Sia-penned title song pairs Dion with dubstep, showing how compelling she can be when there's a beat to work with; Water and a Flame is handsome Mark Ronsonish retro-soul with an Amy Winehouse crack in the vocal. A duet with Ne-Yo, Incredible, has her reverting to type with a trite ballad that vows their love will "go down in history" (like the Titanic and the iceberg, perhaps), but their voices do meld soulfully. Most striking of all is Janis Ian's memoir of ugly-duckling adolescence, At Seventeen, which Dion navigates with heartfelt sensitivity. --- Caroline Sullivan, theguardian.com
